The tangata rongorongo of Easter Island is analogous to the tuhuna o'ono of the Marquesas who served as "master chanter, tribal bard, or ceremonial priest, who presided in all important ritual, and served as repository and teacher of sacred and traditional lore" (104, p. 145). He also taught the sacred chants and led the chanting at family feasts. There were chanting contests between the tuhuna o'ono of different tribes. The word o'ono is the equivalent of rongo since in the Marquesan dialect the r is dropped and the nasal velar (ng) becomes n.

On Mangareva there was a special class of chanters or "intellectuals" who were termed rongórongo (taura rongorongo). They were responsible for the sacred chants for important festivals and recited genealogies and chants in praise of nobility at feasts organized by the king or by chiefs. They knew and transmitted to their pupils both sacred and profane lore—myths, legends, traditions, and historical narrative (28, p. 304).

Warriors

Thomson (215, p. 475) is mistaken when he assumes that "there was no class of professional fighters or soldiers; every able-bodied man was supposed to be a warrior and compelled to do duty in time of war." It is certainly true that most of the men of a tribe participated in a fight but the matatoa were nearly, if not exactly, professional warriors. As men of recognized courage and strength, they were expected to go to war and their presence in a battle was considered a guarantee of victory. Their prestige and the fear they inspired placed them in a special category above the average members of their tribes. They probably did no work. They might be compared to the Marquesan war leaders, matahoha (courageous faces, 104, p. 126).

[171]

In the native texts two words are generally used to designate warriors—matatoa which applies to a man of military fame, and paoa which designates an ordinary soldier. Paoa also means "club" (the short club like the Maori patupatu). The expression kai-tangata or paoa-kai-tangata (cannibal-warriors) appears occasionally in legends in reference to fierce fighters. The use of kai-tangata in this sense forms an exact parallel to the word kaia (famed warrior) of Mangareva.

[171]

Legends and missionary accounts fully agree that the matatoa were not only the leaders in war but were also the actual rulers of the tribes. Some of the matatoa seem to have procured for themselves privileges usually reserved for the ariki. On this point Roussel (190, p. 428) says: "The custom transmitted up to our time requires that the fishermen hand over the tuna fish he caught to the chief or, in his place, to the matatoa." Similar conditions existed on Mangaia where the temporal power passed from the ariki of the Nga-ariki tribe to victorious warriors (31, p. 122). On Easter Island there is no specific record that a matatoa ever ruled over the whole island, but certain legends seem to indicate that some matatoa exercised, at least temporarily, supremacy over all the tribes.

Serfs

The kio were defeated people who were obliged to serve their conquerors or to pay tribute to them with the produce of their lands. Roussel translates kio to mean farmer or servant. On Mangareva a kio was a farmer who had put himself under the protection of a rich landowner or who cultivated a piece of land leased to him by some wealthy man. The kio were the lowest class of small farmers.

After a tribe had been defeated, those who were not killed and eaten were reduced to the condition of kio. Their sufferings and humiliation have been well described by Roussel (190, p. 424) whose information seems to have been obtained first-hand.

When a war was over, the defeated people were kept in caves which they could leave only during working hours. All became slaves and had to plant a certain portion of land for their respective masters. When these masters no longer needed the services of the kio, they sent them home under any pretext but really to have fewer people to feed and especially to make it necessary for them to plant all over again. If a dismissed slave forgot the oft-taught lesson and planted again what he needed for his family, he could expect to be robbed; resistance was useless because it would be paid for by renewed slavery or a new war. Therefore the released slaves planted only one tenth of what they needed for sustenance (p. 120), as they preferred to starve rather than to plant for someone else.

The tales and legends make frequent allusions to kio concealed in caves, pursued to the most uninhabitable parts of the land, and existing there miserably until they were allowed to return to their land or until the fortunes of war had been decided in their favor.

Secret Societies

The following Easter Island legend, if taken literally, seems to indicate the existence of secret societies and of masked persons organized into bands with the purpose of extorting food from the people:

> Six young men named Aamai went with a distant cousin Toka-ngutu, to make masks. They put the masks on and left Hanga-maihiku where they had been concealed, and went then to Hanga-o-honu. They arrived there at night and entered the houses, saying, "We are gods; we are the god Makemake." They behaved like gods and their voices were like that of a spirit. They said, "We want food, wooden images, dance paddles—all the things you have." When they finished with one house, they went to another, and were again given food and other things from the people there. The seven men left Hango-o-honu loaded with goods and returned to Hanga-mai-hiku where they spent a few days. At night they changed their voices to sound like gods. Men, women and children were terrified and believed they were really gods and gave them food, chickens, wooden images, and all sorts of other things.
